

The Landowner's Portrait

Sample buyers: Sarah and James Whitfield, eleven acres on Ridge Road, Powhatan County | Richmond division | Full length version: see the Whitfield sample document

Painted in the rolling hills of Central Virginia

Sarah and James, eleven acres on Ridge Road have been quietly doing you a favor. While you were living your life, your land was becoming the strongest financial asset in your future home's story, and most landowners never get told what that actually means. Here is what it means. The ground you already own can work as your down payment, and the home in this portrait rises without a construction loan standing between you and breaking ground, because Mitchell self funds every build.

Now walk it with us. It is a Saturday in October. The porch faces the back field, the one you can see from the road but never really stood in until now, and the first coffee of the day happens out here, in a rocker, with the fog still sitting in the low spot by the fence line. Inside, the kitchen island holds the middle of everything. It is where the grocery bags land, where James spreads out the survey and the seed catalog at the same time, where Sarah's sister sets down the pie at Thanksgiving because there is finally a surface long enough for it. The first floor primary sits on the quiet side of the house, away from the mudroom door and the dog, with a window that looks straight out at the oaks.

There is a room off the kitchen that started life on the plan as a study and became whatever the season needed: a place for the tax folders in March, a place for the grandkids' sleeping bags in July. Upstairs, two bedrooms wait for the people who visit and stay one night longer than they meant to. And out past the garage, on the gravel pad you already own, there is room for the tractor you have been not buying for six years.

This is what eleven acres has been waiting to hold. Come stand where your porch will be. Powhatan is not waiting, and neither is the math.

Your land is worth more than you think. Here is the math.
