

The Family Portrait

Sample buyers: Priya and Sam Kapoor, two kids and a third on the way, outgrowing a Henrico townhome | Richmond division | Timeline: one to two years

Painted in the rolling hills of Central Virginia

Priya and Sam, somewhere between the second car seat and the news about the third, your townhome quietly changed jobs. It stopped being the home and became the waiting room. This portrait is what comes after the wait.

Picture a Saturday two years from now, out where Richmond opens up, Powhatan, Goochland, New Kent, the counties your whole metro is quietly moving toward. Breakfast is at the island, and the island was sized for five because you told us it would need to be. Pancakes on one end, a car seat parked at the other, and Sam finally has a counter long enough to make eggs without moving the toaster. The pantry is walk in. The fridge is not the townhome fridge. These are small things until you have lived without them.

The flex room off the kitchen is the nursery this year, with a door you can see from the island. In four years it is the playroom, and after that a homework room, and it was drawn with all three in mind. The primary sits upstairs on the far end, away from the kids' rooms and the shared bath, and there is a real laundry room up there, because carrying three kids' worth of laundry down two flights was never going to be the plan.

Then the covered porch, for the evening shift. Bedtime done, baby monitor on the rail, a yard that runs to the tree line instead of a fence you can touch from the window. The land search sounds like one more thing on a very full plate, so we carry it with you. One confident decision at a time until the right acre says yes. The third car seat arrives first. The home arrives right behind it.

Big decisions become small steps. We carry the heavy ones.
