

The Gathering Place

Sample buyers: David and Karen Brooks, four acres on Mallard Point, Smith Mountain Lake | Richmond division | Timeline: the family gathering place now, and the place they plan to retire to

Painted on the water at Smith Mountain Lake

Some homes are where life happens every day. This one is different. This is the place the whole calendar bends toward: the weekend that starts the moment the tires leave the pavement, the porch where the same stories get better every summer. You are not just building a house on Smith Mountain Lake. You are building the place your people will point to when they say, remember when.

Morning here starts on the water. Coffee on the dock while the lake is still glass, the first boat wake an hour away, herons working the shoreline like they own it. Inside, the long table kitchen is already doing its work: holding breakfast, the crossword, the middle of everything, with room for every hand that wants to help.

By afternoon the cove fills with the sound of the rope swing being rediscovered, and by evening the grill is going while the sun puts on a show over the far bank. Lake time is slower time, and this home is built to keep it that way: a covered porch pointed straight at the view, built for the hour when everyone drifts outside and stays.

David and Karen, you told us this is the family gathering place, the address every generation will know by heart. The long table, the bunk room, the fourth of July with a permanent home. And you told us about the long game too: this is where you plan to wake up when the alarm clock finally loses its job. Houses like this do a quiet kind of work. They keep a family close long after the kids have zip codes of their own, and they are ready for you the day you are ready for them.

The place you keep promising yourselves. Here is how it becomes real.

YOUR SPACES | A HOME SHAPED AROUND YOUR ANSWERS

Room for everyone

Bedrooms and bunk space planned for full house weekends, so the whole crew has a landing spot and nobody draws the couch.

The long table kitchen

An island and dining space sized for the crowd, because in this house, the kitchen is where the reunion actually happens.

Outdoor living, pointed at the view

A covered porch aimed straight at the water, built for the hour when everyone drifts outside and stays there.

Built to hand down

Stick built construction, quality checked at every stage, with the included features list in writing. A gathering place should outlast the generation that builds it.

At your design consultation we will walk plans that match this portrait. sized for full house weekends. and personalize every detail from our 40,000 plus selections.
