

The Family Portrait

TRANSITIONER | HAS LAND

Sample buyers: Marcus and Tia Williams, building on family land in Johnston County with Tia's mother joining | Raleigh division | Timeline: six to twelve months

Painted among the Carolina pines, the Triangle

Marcus and Tia, life is moving fast at your house, a family growing in one direction, a mother who should be closer in the other, and a floor plan that stopped fitting the life inside it a while ago. Here is the good news this portrait carries: the answer has been in the family the whole time.

Picture a Thursday evening about a year from now. The school bus stops at the end of the drive, where the pines your grandfather left standing throw long shadows, and the kids come in through the mudroom, the room that exists precisely so backpacks and cleats never reach the kitchen. Mom is already home. Her suite is on the main floor: her own door, her own light, her own mornings, a short walk down the hall when she wants company and a closed door when she does not.

The gathering kitchen is big enough for three generations of opinions about dinner. The island holds homework on one end and the cutting board on the other, and the walk in pantry holds enough for the week because Tia is done shopping twice. Upstairs, the kids each get a room and a shared bath, and the bonus room over the garage becomes the place where the noise goes. The primary is up there too, because Marcus wanted one floor between the two of you and everyone else.

Out back, the covered porch looks at the same pines you grew up under, and on Sunday the whole family, all three generations of it, is sitting on it. Because your season of life is full, the process bends to you. Big decisions become small steps, and a team carries the heavy ones. About 150 days after we break ground, everyone is home.

Big decisions become small steps. We carry the heavy ones.
